What is entrepreneurship?

The word 'entrepreneur' is widely used, both in everyday conversation and as a technical term in management and economics. Its origin lies in seventeenth-century France, where an 'entrepreneur' was an individual commissioned to undertake a particular commercial project by someone with money to invest

The entrepreneur can be considered as:

- a manager undertaking an activity – i.e. in terms of the particular tasks they perform and the way they undertake them;
- an agent of economic change – i.e. in terms of the effects they have on economic systems and the changes they drive; and as
- an individual – i.e. in terms of their psychology, personality and personal characteristics (including peculiarities in cognitive strategy and style) .

The entrepreneur's tasks

- Founding new organisations
 - Bringing innovations to market
 - Identification of market opportunity
 - Application of expertise
 - Provision of leadership
 - The entrepreneur as manager

The role of the entrepreneur

- Combination of economic factors
- Providing market efficiency
- Accepting risk
- Maximising investors' returns
- Processing of market information
