Personality and entrepreneurship: some theoretical issues

The idea that an entrepreneur is, in some way, a special sort of person is commonly held. Surveys that I conduct with undergraduates and postgraduates at the start of courses in entrepreneurship suggest that typically 85 per cent of students hold the belief that there is something unique about the personality of entrepreneurs

Schools of thinking on personality

Psychology, like economics, is a subject that is characterised by numerous schools that agree on some particulars and disagree on others. A fairly general definition of personality might be along the lines of:

A relatively stable pattern or profile of thoughts, feelings and actions that characterise a particular individual

Or

What makes us unique

Carver and Scheier (2000) develop a definition of personality that covers areas of general agreement across the different schools.

- Organised – it has a coherent unity and is not fragmented.
 - Active – personality is maintained by and revealed through dynamic processes.
 - Physical – personality is a psychological concept, but it is derived from physical (anatomical, neurophysiological) processes, particularly, but not exclusively, in the brain.
 - Causal – personality determines how an individual will act and react in particular circumstances.
 - Regular – the personality of an individual is consistent over periods of time, and leads to consistent patterns of behaviour.
 - Manifest – it shows up in many different ways, including physical states, affective moods, personal feelings, decisions and actions.

Discussion point

All entrepreneurs share certain personality characteristics.
